Then I heard Mr. R - call out words, something like, "Don't let them surrender, shoot them all!!"

the firm. "I have nothing against the company," says a former executive. "I just don't want to work for a company that's going to be a public enemy." and identifying it as a single company. (Lobbying efforts were made to get the firm out of the state. The National Rifle Association "put out its public relations people to make sure that the [state] legislature didn't become confused by the fact that the [company] was not a single entity," says the national office in Washington. But the firm's public relations people were not as effective as the NRA's. The legislature passed the law, and the company is now in the state.)

Other states have taken similar action. In 1990, the House of Representatives passed legislation to force the NRA to register as a national lobbying group. The bill was vetoed by President George H. W. Bush. The House passed the bill again in 1993, but the Senate did not act on it.

The NRA's success in getting the law passed in the state is a testament to the power of the organization. The NRA has a long history of lobbying and has been successful in getting its way on many occasions.
